COOL IN THE COLD

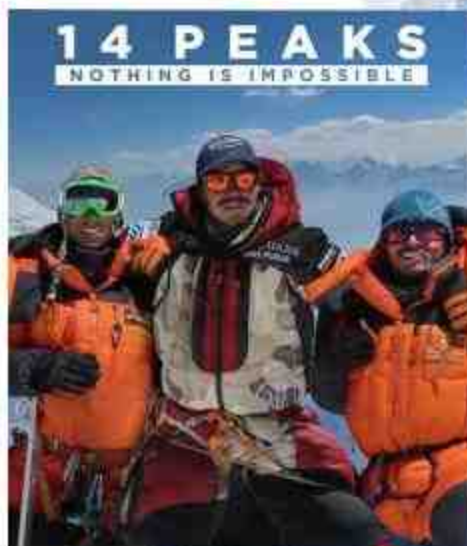

Cool in the cold is the focus of the work. For me sports and extreme activities in the snow and ice are the coolest. This had led me to look into climbers and their environment alongside the equipment used nowadays and in the past.

GQ magazine found in the archive.

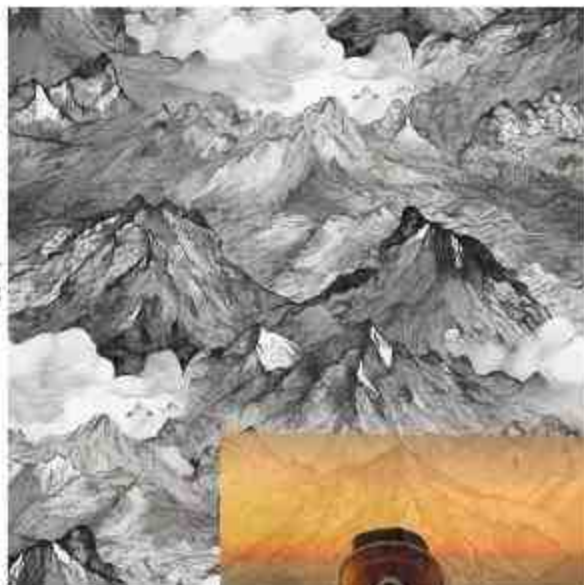

Nobody is cooler in the cold than Nimsdai. Nepal born, British special forces before becoming a MT Everest sherpa.

14 peaks was a mission he set himself to do. The 14 highest mountains in under 6 months with no oxygen. Never done before.

The textures of the mountainous surroundings are very interesting and make good prints.

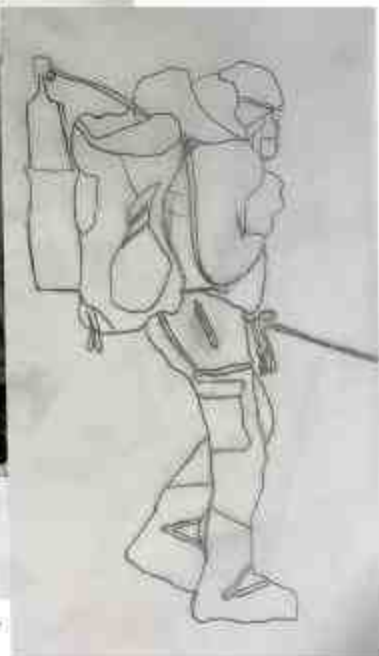

The frozen frost.

The climbers of that past have very little equipment just the use of ropes. One large pocket at the front of the garments, baggy fit.

Rucksack used to carry all equipment including oxygen tanks.

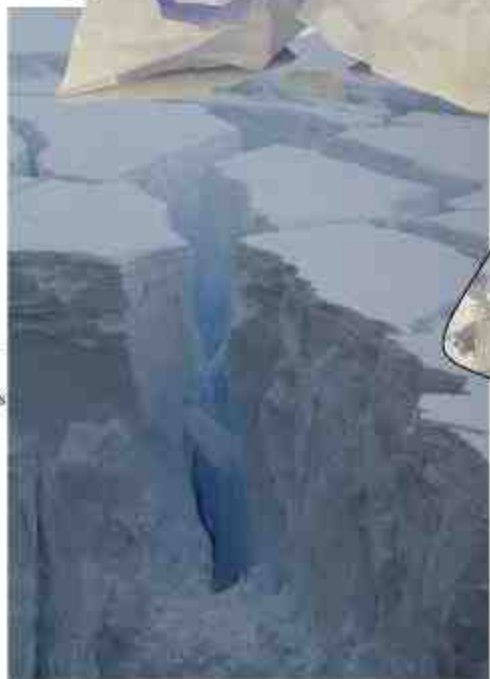

Very casual for climbing a mountain.

Rock and snow makes a cool pattern.

Prints made from crumpled paper made to look like mountains and other imagery of the harsh cold surroundings.

Crevasses separate areas forming different sections of ice to pass through.

The hoodie is a casual garment that has many different panels. I like this and want to use this in my designs as I can relate it to the crevasses that appear in the cold climates.

The jacket has a nice boxy fit that appeals to me and could be similar to the climbing gear in the past. It has a subtle all over print which is something I would like to pursue.

Head gear is very important for cold weather activities as the head is the most sensitive to temperature changes. Hats and other accessories are important, and I would like to design these for my collection.

Warm winter ware inspired by the cold climates.

Many of the designs are oversized following the fit of the climbers of the past.

The use of rope like material in parts like pockets hint to the importance of harnesses for climbers.

The panelling of garments are a reminder of dangers of the surrounding crevasses.

Adding subtle details to the garments creates a more personal connection and results in a more engaging, meaningful design.
